Suggested answer:

After three months of living here and there, with strangers and relatives, we were finally on our way home. As we drove down the mountain pass and saw the Swat River, my father began to weep. And when we saw the condition of poor Mingora, we were all in tears. Everywhere we looked, we saw buildings in rubble, piles of wreckage, burned-out cars, and smashed-out windows. Storefronts had had their heavy metal shutters pried off; their windows were gaping, their shelves empty. It seemed that every building was pockmarked with bullet holes. And even though the government had said it was safe to go back, most people were still too afraid to return. The bus station, normally bustling with the chaos of brightly coloured buses and hundreds of travellers, was deserted, and weeds were growing up through cracks in the paving.
