(10p)

The air around the fire had become hot and hard to breathe. The smoke was black and smelled of burnt ink. The books were in no hurry to be burned; they crackled, shattering the eardrums and throwing off reddish sparks, which could have leaped into our eyes or onto our clothes. The established hierarchy didn't last long. In a flash, the outlaws took over the task of throwing the books into the fire. It was exhausting for my thin arms to throw book after book, volume after volume, as far as possible into the blaze. My attention was drawn to a name: Sigmund Freud. [...] Clumsily, I dropped it at my feet. The fire had raged, and the textbook was immediately engulfed by flames, its pages flying into the air, in a few tumbles, in a final struggle for life, sparkling and eventually disappearing into the ether.
