IV. (10p) Suggested answer:

'Crazy coyote,' I muttered to myself. And I was just about to put my foot on my rock step and grab onto the platform to lift my body onto it, when I thought the word: warning.

It's a warning, I thought, and even though I was still moving my leg to put my foot on the rock, I glanced up at the platform. And there, right at the level of my face, not half a metre away, a rattlesnake sunned its tummy on the floor of my studio.

I immediately seized the movement in my leg and stopped it, but doing that unbalanced me. I stumbled backwards and fell flat onto the path, waking up the rattlesnake. Rattlesnakes are evidently not morning people. It hissed at me and flipped itself over easily and rapidly. That took my breath away. I was scrambling backwards on my hands and feet, like an extremely awkward crab, when the snake raised its head and its tail and rattled a warning at me.
